According to SQM Research, Australia's residential dwelling vacancy rate inclined slightly to 1.3% in February 2025, up from 1.0% in January 2025. The total number of rental vacancies rose to 38,427, a rise from 30,161 in the previous month.

Sydney's rental vacancy rate increased to 1.5%, with 11,155 rental dwellings now vacant, compared to 10,151 in January. The increase in rental vacancies suggests a slight easing in the rental market from the tightening over January. Notably, national rental vacancy rates slightly higher than this time in 2024.

SQM's calculations of vacancies are based on online rental listings that have been advertised for three weeks or more compared to the total number of established rental properties. SQM considers this to be a superior methodology compared to using a potentially incomplete sample of agency surveys or merely relying on raw online listings advertised. Louis Christopher, Managing Director of SQM Research said:

"National rental vacancy rates rose somewhat in February, which was somewhat surprising to us given there was no increase in total rental listings. That suggests advertised rental properties were taking about 3 to 4 days longer to rent and occupy on average than January. But I don't regard that as a material increase. I would not be surprised to see vacancy rates fall again in March which typically records the stronger rental demand.

Advertised rents continued to rise over the month for the capital cities, but not at the extreme pace that was recorded over 2021 to 2023. This suggests there has been an easing in rental growth expectations by landlords but nevertheless advertised rents are still rising faster than the overall inflation rate.

Overall, the data we have released today still suggests the country remains in a rental crisis, driven by a combination of excess population growth and multi-year lows in dwelling completions.
